Who would envy - Sting

Old enough to be her dad But the young men were just mad They nursed their grievances And she was flattered by his charm It wouldn't do her any harm They all had their chances He sent her flowers and limousines She was treated like a queen Anything she ever wanted It was no problem for a man like him And everyone expected soon That she could ask him for the moon If she would wear his ring Knowing glances from his friends In the homes at the weekends of high society But he didn't give a damn He never felt more like a man And all the time the clock was ticking And all would envy The older man and his beautiful young wife Yes, all would envy In a house upon a hill She was there with time to kill She lived a life she'd only dreamed The life was never what it seemed To all her friends that she'd ignored She denied she was bored She had no time for dancing, No time for dancing But the clock upon the wall That was ticking in the hall Always reminded her That life was going on as well But she was happy and she would swear She wouldn't change a thing

And all would envy

Yes, all would envy Now it's 5 o'clock am She must have spent the night again With that old friend of hers She loves to dance She's missing more and more these days But he's still stuck in his old ways Perhaps she needs a little more romance But the clock upon the wall Is still ticking in the hall She must be home soon... soon Where a younger man would weep He takes a pill and goes to sleep Now who would envy The older man and his beautiful young wife Who would envy? Who would envy?

The older man and his beautiful young wife
